

A Day in the Park

Tuesday, 26 September 2006

Regina has almost as many Trees as it does Citizens. From memory, I think the tree count was over 175,000 trees, each of which were planted by man (or woman), not one was here naturally.

The City of Regina works hard to keep their Parks and property looking tip top and presentable. What I'd like to know is, how did this bit of property slip through the cracks? It may be an obscene eye-sore to have seven dandelions on an empty lot in the South or East End, but in the inner city core, this passes as a 'Community Park'.

Equality, or Duplicity? Discuss.

{mosgoogle}